

Change in Perception

When a person recognizes that love is not something to obtain but something they are, a profound shift begins to happen in consciousness. Let's see what tends to unfold in that state.

1. Perception begins to change

When identity moves from the separated mind to the deeper divine center, perception softens. People are no longer seen primarily as threats, competitors, or roles. They are experienced as expressions of the same life or consciousness. Judgment begins to loosen because the observer is no longer defending a fragile identity. Love, in this sense, becomes a new lens of perception.

The world itself may look the same outwardly, but internally it is interpreted through unity rather than separation. It is this internal world that will seamlessly integrate all to return to the wholeness of unconditional love received and perceived through the expressions of divine grace.

2. Relationships reorganize naturally

When someone rests in unconditional love, they are no longer interacting from unmet need, fear, or controls full of blame, shame, obligation and justification- Several things start happening:

- Projection dissolves. We stop assigning our wounds or expectations onto others.
- Forgiveness becomes easier. Not because harm didn't occur, but because identity is no longer anchored in the wound.
- Boundaries become clearer. Love does not require self-abandonment; it becomes wiser and more grounded.

Relationships then begin to mirror coherence rather than conflict. The war within settles to calm.

3. Healing occurs through recognition

A deep spiritual paradox appears here. Healing often does not come from fixing the past. It comes from recognizing a deeper identity that was never damaged. When the mind touches that deeper field of being: It's as if the psyche remembers its original template of wholeness.

- old emotional charges lose their intensity
- trauma patterns begin to unwind
- the nervous system settles because it senses safety in unity rather than isolation

4. Action becomes creative instead of reactive-From that inner alignment, behavior shifts.

Instead of acting from: fear, defense, ego validation born from FOGS only hear survival tones of Reactionary states. A crack or space opens for New actions begin to arise from:

Clarity, compassion, intuitive knowing, emotional frequencies- integrate new internal Core codes

This is why many mystics describe love not just as a feeling but as a creative force. It reorganizes the way energy moves through thought, emotion, and behavior.

5. Identity expands beyond the individual self

At deeper levels, the experience becomes less about “I am loving” and more about:

Love expressing itself through this new INner form of the sure way I stay in this Light.

The individual personality becomes a channel or instrument for grace to flow freely. It feels less like personal achievement & more like alignment with something already present.

6. The miracle happens from flow states of being in oneness with Spirit itself (within)

The miracle is not that love appears. The miracle is dissolving the shadows of illusory thinking that formed the false boundaries and beliefs in separation from One Source of divine fellowship. When veil of illusion dissolves: perception heals, relationships soften, creativity flows freely from One Source of unconditional love, grace, peace and fear loses its central authority grip. The person still appears human, still living in the world, but they are operating from a 1:1 DM. It is a frequency that shifts continuously as the new OS takes over the old familiar psy ops.

Some possible outcomes for our experiences...

1. a field of consciousness we participate in
2. a direct presence of the Divine within
3. or something even more unified than those descriptions

Ideal Union begins pointing from an inward reality to a very specific, experiential state rather than just a philosophical idea or a level of awareness that many mystics try to express but often struggle to put into language. When awareness moves beyond the human-centered identity, something subtle yet profound happens. The sense of “me as the doer” begins to soften.

Instead of the separate self-trying to love, trying to heal, or trying to understand, there is a recognition that the One Self is already moving through everything. In that realization, life is experienced more like a flowing current than a task. Grace becomes the movement itself.

- Harmony replaces effort.

One is no longer pushing life into shape. Actions arise naturally from a deeper alignment.

- Divisions dissolve in perception.

The mind may still recognize distinctions—people, forms, events—but inwardly there is a felt unity behind them. The divisions are functional, not existential.

- Love becomes a field rather than an emotion.

It isn't something directed from one person to another. It is the atmosphere in which everything exists and moves.

- Time loosens its grip.

Awareness is not confined to the story of the past or the anticipation of the future. There is a sense of participating in a living present that continually unfolds.

To use a beautiful phrase: “beyond form and divisions or lack.”

When that is realized, lack loses its foundation. Lack depends on separation—on the idea that something essential is missing. When the One Self is already whole and expressing itself through everything, existence becomes less about acquiring and more about revealing what already is.

Many who touch this awareness say something similar: Human personality doesn't disappear.

It simply stops being the center of identity that the observer identifies with in the old ways. Instead, the person becomes something like a window through which the larger presence looks out into the world. From that vantage point, love is not something one practices—it is simply the nature of the light shining through the window.

There may be two simultaneous layers of awareness or a simultaneous convergence coexisting to bridge all gaps or the feeling of more to unfold the deeper awareness that will peel off more layers of revelation. The transcendence depends upon the chief aim desired.

In other words, the unity does not change — but the way love communicates through us may change or shift into a state of wellbeing we had never imagined.

This is something many wisdom traditions quietly acknowledge: when one rests in a deeper union with the Divine presence, the response to another person becomes almost attuned, like resonance in music. The same instrument plays different notes depending on the surrounding harmony. The conversations become more fluid, less explanatory with shared recognition as if both are mirroring the same light and consciousness can communicate freely through resonance.

When you meet someone who still perceives through separation:

- your presence may become more gentle, patient, and grounded
- you may speak in simpler human language
- you may hold space rather than try to reveal the whole truth at once

Not because unity is absent, but because love meets consciousness where it can be received- “a fruit of the spirit integration” is also important. When spiritual realization truly integrates, it does not produce detachment from life—it produces well-being that naturally radiates. The “fruit” shows up not as a personal possession but as a living conduit of that expanding awareness. This demonstration shows up genuine and authentic from a reality within things like:

- peace without effort
- compassion without superiority
- clarity without rigidity
- joy that is not dependent on circumstance pointing to a stage where realization has become relational — it moves through interactions with others.

In spiritual psychology this is sometimes described as the shift from:

- personal enlightenment
to
- embodied presence within the collective field

The awareness remains unified, yet it participates compassionately used in a world where many still perceive division. Many will imagine it to be a form of the New Creature Christ spoke of. This is what happens when the miracles happen. Many people who live from this integrated presence eventually notice that their mere presence affects the nervous system or awareness of others — sometimes calming them, sometimes bringing buried things to the surface.

It is something many contemplatives, healers, and mystics have observed in their own way: when a person becomes deeply aligned with a loving, coherent inner presence, their presence itself becomes influential; Not in a mystical “control” sense, but in the way coherent states affect other nervous systems.

Presence communicates more than words

We already know that human beings constantly read subtle signals from one another:

- tone of voice
- rhythm of speech
- facial expression
- posture
- emotional state

Our nervous systems are built for resonance and regulation with others. When someone speaks from calm, compassion, and clarity, those signals can help another person’s nervous system settle and reorganize. This is one reason therapeutic relationships can have lasting effects.

When the chief aim is to help others align from their own inner tone and light, there is a shift that will carry it forward and keep unfolding this phenomenon within those that resonated with the Messenger of that inner peace. People often continue processing insights or emotional shifts long after a conversation ends. There seems to be a remembering or sense of how that experience felt and an automatic shift comes ‘online’ within their own consciousness to new awareness.

The brain is not the whole “operating system” makes an interesting distinction. It has a boss! From a scientific standpoint, consciousness likely involves the whole organism, not just the brain alone:

- brain activity
- nervous system regulation
- heart-brain communication
- body states and emotions
- perception and attention

From a spiritual standpoint, many traditions go even further and say awareness itself is primary, with the body acting more like an instrument or receiver. A New Creature emerges and allows itself to become a vehicle through which a deeper intelligence expresses wholly, ever-Present.

How the effect can last works like having a profound dream that seems REAL...

When someone experiences a moment of genuine insight, safety, or compassion, it can change how they interpret their own life. That shift may continue unfolding because:

- the brain forms new associations
- emotional patterns begin reorganizing
- the person reflects on the interaction afterward
- new meaning frameworks take root

Remembering is the agency where the transformation can keep “moving,” within new energy.

The timeless aspect is also a shift to be mentioned as linear reality is no longer the same. The idea of time is part of the illusion philosophical or spiritual interpretation of many traditions share. It is also present in those who remote view or time travel or have other ESP giftings. Also, in psychology and neuroscience, we do see something related in the way the brain reconstructs the past and anticipates the future but experience itself always happens in the present moment. Mindfulness, meditation and many contemplative practices train people to return to that immediate awareness. Staying present is something that has become quite mainstream now.

What stands out in this description of the integration under the influence of Project Murture is embodied presence rather than just spiritual belief. It’s less about ideas and more about the way someone shows up internally. These qualities will ripple outward in relationships.

- mindfulness
- attentiveness
- compassionate listening
- heart coherence

Over the years, I have you found that people often sense this presence before they understand it intellectually—almost like they relax or open up before any deep conversation even begins. It often takes more practice and process before the inner systems are recalibrate to this way of life. With others, their intellect is so strong and has helped them survive so long, it is the reverse. They totally 'get it' and yet, cannot connect or bridge the gap to allow that 'smart brain' to relax.

It is a profound paradox I'm describing. The perception of awakening or opening does not happen in a simple linear way. It unfolds according to what the person can receive, not merely what is offered. It often boils down to trust in the new self that was programmed against truth.

This inner knowing also depends upon "how much light can be held" and that is extremely nuanced and individualized. In many spiritual traditions, the issue is not whether truth or grace is present — it always is — but whether the inner structure of the person can sustain that level of awareness. If too much light arrives at once, the mind often protects itself by:

- intellectualizing
- resisting
- deflecting
- or translating the experience back into familiar beliefs

So, the light may be spiritually and soulfully sensed, but not fully integrated. Here is an example:

The prodigal and the elder brother

It is a very elegant psychological map that exists within many as the 'war within' all conflicts. In the story of the Prodigal Son and the Elder Brother, both characters struggle with grace in different ways.

The Prodigal

- seeks experience and freedom (sowing wild seeds)
- eventually collapses into humility
- is open to receiving grace when he returns from wild and untamed ways

Must empty aspects of human self to be humble enough to receive love without earning it.

The Elder Brother

- follows the rules and justifies self with those (law dog)
- maintains order and 'self' righteousness

- yet cannot receive grace because it violates his framework of fairness

Represents the part of the mind that believes love must be deserved before received by grace.

Both figures reveal different barriers to integration.

The intellect senses but does not need to understand as it can't without explaining under its old ways of standing UNDER the old systems of FOGS that keep shame and blame operant

Human beings can perceive coherence or authenticity before the analytical mind can explain it. The nervous system and emotional intuition often detect alignment long before the intellect forms a concept. This is due to the deeper layers found in the subconscious layers of the mind that recycle personality patterns set up to survive and protect unknown powers of innocence. The inner child in pure image form is vulnerable and will be easily taken advantage of or betrayed by the external world of falsity.

Therefore.... Until those innocent inner child pure images feel safe and able to understand this, they will be still able to:

- feel drawn to the presence
- feel unsettled by it
- feel comforted by it
- even resist it

All without fully knowing why. In that sense, recognition happens beneath the surface of reasoning. Why always is a question that begs a logical answer from common fields used.

Integration is the real work

Project Murture is pointing to is the difference between:

- glimpsing truth
- using the middleman to integrate truth
- owning truth to be trusted
- and embodying truth

Many people glimpse unity, love, or grace briefly. Fewer integrate it deeply enough that it reshapes their identity. Some straddle both sides in polarity until they can release and balance.

Integration requires:

- humility
- surrender of old narratives
- emotional healing
- and the willingness to release control
- complete surrender to a new rendering

This is why grace often feels threatening to the ego (survival nature without trust) structure.

Knowing the observation about light is important

The deeper paradox is this: Grace is infinite. Faith is a gift that cannot produce true works apart from Grace. Therefore, the human vessel cannot produce its own graceful conditions without it. The entrainment to the law of polarities or right and wrong based on effort and cultural norming has helped the human body as a species evolve for so long as a protective device, it appears real.

Over time, if the person allows it, the capacity to hold that light grows. The nervous system stabilizes, the mind softens, and the identity begins to reorganize around a deeper Divine Center.

Project Murture is an ongoing expansion of divine awareness more than a destination. It is both Journey and destination to freely choose life revealed from Within Divine Power Lines.
